An analysis of the literature shows that during recent years the diagnosis of neonatal and infantile testicular tumors has been greatly improved. A panel of markers (cytology, chromosomal studies, and determination of serum tumor markers) led to a better definition of the nature of these tumors. Another step in the evolution of the classification of testicular tumors has been the introduction of a new classification. The major differential diagnosis of germ cell neoplasms is between embryonal carcinoma and yolk sac tumor. Combined erythroblastosis and/or myeloid hemangioblastomas are peculiar tumors of the testis of the erythroblastic and myeloid lineages, with clinical manifestations related to other hemopoietic malignancies, the diagnosis of which was not established at the time of the occurrence of a testicular tumor. Seminoma, adult type, is a tumor which tends to spread, so chemotherapy or radiotherapy should be considered for these patients. The treatment of testicular germ cell tumors is based on combination chemotherapy with vinblastine and cisplatin in an intensive program. Following vinblastine the patient may continue on observation or receive single agent treatment using cisplatin. Recently, the first results of a pilot study of a new protocol based on a combination of vincristine, etoposide, and cisplatin have been reported. These results confirm the interest of using a combination of drugs rather than just one. Over the last few years progress has been made in the immunohistochemical study of testicular neoplasms. Although a series of markers has been used in the diagnosis of the different histological types, the role of the individual markers is still under study. In addition to the definition of the nature of the lesions, the techniques of diagnosis allow a more specific prognosis. Some classes of the tumors are associated with a high probability of spontaneous regression. At the present time no reliable prognostic factor has been defined.Q: How to access dynamic Json object in c# I have a json string called "
